Things have changed in the last decade. Now enterprising families are on the move outdoor kitchen chores and honoring play time with a room of their own. It's not that surprising. Since more and more of us are exercising at video games and using big balls, rolling to buff our backsides, no wonder we want a wall or two between us and a gawking, giggling world. A games room can be central fun for a lot of activities if you're going to get it right, and these ideas will help you raise the game while (hopefully) improving your shape – whatever game of choice happens to be. Contents How often do you use the dining area -- once or twice a year? If you have a room dedicated to Christmas dinner, what do you do with the space the rest of the time? Do you use it to store your magazines? Here's a thought: Turn that large, underused space into a game room. If you're passionate about billiards, it's a wedding made in the paradise of the table. There are kits that can convert that big slate elephant into a table and back again. You can cook and serve a large meal on turkey day and still poke some balls around later. Advertising Room Games can be the soap box you need to announce your affiliations to the world. From circles to hops (as in your favorite drink on tap), if you like, put a sign. Buy sports fabrics for curtains and furniture. Collect and display hats (needles, pens, posters and souvenirs). Game rooms can look kitsch, retro, masculine, fanciful, child-friendly or adult indulgent, depending on your personal style - or mood. If you have Texas Hold 'Em on your brain, the games room will look different from your sister Clue clone is designing to go along with her passion for Agatha Christie. The design of the gaming room can be bizarre without being insipid, and that's pretty liberating. Advertising If testosterone is thick enough around your home at weekends, make the game room in a man cave worth a large bowl of pork peels (or loaded nachos). You may have a pipe rack and humidifier sensitivity or prefer something a little less country chic chic, it would be a mini-circle mounted over the wastepaper basket and the largest TV flat screen you can afford. Whatever you do design-wise, lose pastels (along with beads, brocade and elaborate accents), and don't even think about a matchy-matchy furniture setup. We like natural materials, such as wood, cork, bamboo, bamboo, and wool. Eroded architectural and metal elements such as wrought iron or slightly rusty signs look at the house in a cave man how game room as well. Advertising The idea is to capture the essence of casual, masculine ambience. Think tempting aftershave, not a three-day-old underwear. We also like brass or tin accents, dark lamp shades and hunting green (or red rust, navy or chocolate). Some of these suggestions may seem classic male cliché, but it works. If you ever thought a lavender dress shirt would look pretty weird on your guy, you can understand the value of bonding with classics. If your home is too small for a dedicated game room, annex the part of the garage for fun and some male chaos. Your other significant can spend a lot of time there anyway. A lot of two-car garages are pretty deep these days, and that extra square foot way can do more than store winter salt alley supply and snow blower. Instead, stow the seasonal items on a wire ceiling storage shelf, and free up a space for a few feet of bark and stick parquet (or concrete paint), some chairs, a foosball table and all-important flat screen on a swivel arm. After that, the ornaments are up to you. A nice thing about this arrangement is that a garage type game area (think: craft room with chest hair) does not have to be a knockout decoration. If your electric house box is prominent on the back wall, paint some stripes on it like a barber's pole, stick a sign not bother over it and you're done. Advertising If you are a two-car family with a single-pay budget, you become a single-vehicle household. It sounds painful, but being able to use half the garage for something more fun than storing a gas pig has some merit; don't just reject it. You'll save on insurance, vehicle maintenance and gasoline (probably), and you'll be forced to rethink how you use energy. With the money you save, you can invest in some of those gaming room toys you've always wanted, such as a classic arcade or jukebox game console. If having to carpool -- even with someone you love -- doesn't appeal to you, you might consider putting in a car port and turning the entire garage into a game room. In some temperate states, a garage can be a sad waste of space. If you only use it to store decades of family castoffs, what do you have to lose? Advertising Making your family's living area a game-friendly place can be the way to go if you're big on fun but short on square footing. The elements of a game room can work almost anywhere if you're willing to blend functions. It's an effective way to make your a casual and lighthearted place to hang out, too. You might be in for some haggling over that activities take precedence, but a big advantage is that strengthening family and gambling activities will at least keep everyone together in the same space. Define furniture groups for specific functions and offer room dividers, such as shelves and screens better functionality and fewer arguments. Advertising Yes, most classic games have started outdoors: football, baseball, watermelon bowling. Hell, public parks are even popular places to play board games, like chess and checkers. Why not build an outdoor games room instead of an outdoor kitchen or family area? It won't matter if things get noisy or noisy. If someone spills a toothbrush or throws a slice of pizza on the floor, the world won't end either. Innovative outdoor rooms are a big deal. What you really need for a gaming room anyway -- electrical services, element protection, and a few amenities would be comfortable chairs. If you've ever visited a stadium or ballpark to enjoy great American fun or to watch some serious athletes throw pigskin around, moving outdoor gambling will seem like a natural. Advertising If the visions of poker tables, billiard tables and wet bars go through your mind when you think about the advantages of a game room, you might want to consider children as well. It's true that childhood seems like a big joke -- when you're big, anyway. But the truth is that playing games as a family is a powerful way to touch the base with tweens and teenagers - and eventually start laughing together instead of arguing about wardrobe, tattoos, piercings, curfew and homework. Electronic games seem to be the order of the day, but old-fashioned board games such as Monopoly and Scrabble can be fun, engaging and educational as well. I'm also on the dosing and tactile, two things that many electronic games lack. You can have games for adults as well as the family rate in the games room. Just be sure to maintain the G-rated décor, and use some child-centric motifs and diversions. If you want an adult-only games room, consider the dedicated game areas in your children's bedrooms. That's fair enough. Advertising If the kitchen is the heart of the house, the games room is where people gather -- after they finish eating. It will become a central guest in no time, and having a dip nearby will make life easier for everyone involved. Adding a wet bar, or at least access to a mini fridge and microwave, will keep the action centralized and save you from schlepping up and down from the basement (or anywhere) to make popcorn and get drinks. Game rooms are fun rooms, and yours will be much more fun if it's close to or contains popular amenities and features. Advertising Playrooms with poor lighting or located on empty concrete floors are not very welcoming or functional. When planning your game room, think about it: function first and style second. Mass won't see much action if there's not enough room around it to swing a pool cue. Some other things to do include: Measure the space and make sure the layout has a good traffic flow, provides adequate visibility and provides enough space to enjoy the facilities. Make sure you have electrical services on all four walls and containers in any location you will be placing sound, video or gaming equipment. Consider putting in acoustic tiles or sound mitigation wall panels. Install a lot of flexible lighting of the activity, would be the railway lights. Don't skimp on comfortable seats. Modular groups with multiple recliners on board are nice, but even if you keep a bunch of beanbag chairs in a corner, they have enough seats for everyone. Invest in storage. Game and recreation rooms are magnets for clutter. Library units with electronics shelves and drawers to hide games or DVDs can help you control overtaking and keep items such as cards, remote controls, coasters, notepads and pens under wraps. Invest in wicker baskets or baskets to store entertainment magazines and a very important stack of remote control devices with unique, multiple and unknown functions. Look for flexible styling. Convertible gaming tables that include a number of popular games in one and foldable or foldable furniture are examples of accessories that can make double-duty or shop easily. The British standardized what it means for an item to be sterling silver way back into the 14th century. But can you tell if something's sterling or not? BCA-Pool. Funny facts. Undated. (4/24/11).
